Spears were often a mainstay in a medieval army, although in close quarters combat, a huge six-foot long spear could become more than unwieldy. That's why there were shorter spears, like this Guard Spear, which excelled at a much shorter range. This spear is modeled no differently than a typical medieval warrior's spear, with one exception. Where-as a typical warrior would have carried a spear that was easily five to six feet in length, this spear is much shorter, making it lighter and easier to carry, as well as much easier to wield in tight spaces, as well as easier to wield skillfully with one hand. The spear is otherwise a standard spear, featuring a leaf-shaped blade with a broad, round base that gradually tapers to a sharp, penetrative point. The spear-head is crafted from carbon steel and measures approximately 19 inches long, while the included hardwood shaft the spear-head is mounted on has a length of 22 inches. Effectively a short spear, this Guard Spear is the weapon to choose when you're looking for something that duplicates the function of a spear, without possessing a potentially unwieldy length or size.
